

His work focuses on examining the material and symbolic frameworks that structure our environments—not to offer a simple reading of them, but to reveal their tensions and contradictions. Through the objects he diverts or recomposes, he questions the logics of use, the mechanisms of control, and the implicit narratives that shape our everyday gestures. Each sculpture, each filmed sequence becomes a tool for displacement, a way of making visible what presents itself in our spaces as neutral but is, in reality, political.

By observing architectures of waiting, industrial infrastructures, or urban devices, he brings to light the ways these systems orient our behaviors and organize our relationship to the world. His approach, informed by field research and collaboration with the social sciences, does not seek effect but understanding: understanding how an object acts, how a space imposes, how a fiction organizes the real.

His works thus function as materialized hypotheses, possible scenarios that invite us to think differently about our environments. They open spaces for discussion and projection, where each person can re-examine what once seemed self-evident. In this shift, his practice reminds us that forms are never innocent, and that questioning them always means re-questioning the structures that shape us.

In the Measure of Water

Like every summer—always—he had walked miles, backpack on his shoulders, to retrace her path, scrutinizing every rock with a magnifying glass, pacing every path that might lead him to her, to her source. He knew she had passed that way, and the valley inevitably held traces of her past or hidden presence that he tried to capture using tools of his own making, alone under the blazing sun.

Was it the heat and fatigue? One day, just as he was about to stop his search and resume it the next day, he heard her. At first, he thought it was merely the invisible presence of a lost shepherd. Then he listened more closely, and from a sparkling rock came the gentle voice of water:

I am indeed here for those who know how to listen
sometimes visible, sometimes hidden, I navigate by sight under, over, inside, outside
I rise and fall, I merge with the landscape
I sink into the depths
I carve my bed and shape the earth, I mold the rock that nourishes me
I slip into every crevice until I vanish, then reappear elsewhere
I have neither beginning nor end and am constantly transforming
I exist in all my states
I flow naturally and constantly evade those who wish to guide me
I move over hills and through valleys, from washhouses to hands
I am studied scrupulously
I am traced, sought, collected, channeled
I am preserved, used
I am exploited, spent
Contrary to appearances, I am not transparent
I hold unfathomable secrets within me

The water spoke softly, and he felt as if rocked. If it was a hallucination, it was a providence... The water was there. It was everywhere, all the time. Until when?
Where would water come from once the glaciers disappeared? How would we manage without it?
Would it still murmur in the valley?

Questions flowed like streams, and dehydration was setting in. He absolutely had to return to the village. After a long walk, he rested in the shade of the trees in the square, between the washhouse and the fountain where he could refresh himself. As he regained his senses, bluish and orange reflections shimmered from the running water, and he saw in them a new sign that she was passing by, just for him.

The body of work formed by Memories (2025) and the film In the beginning was the end (2025) explores the relationships between memory, use, and the transformation of objects and environments. Positioned at the boundary between utility and futility, these works freeze hybrid objects in an indefinite time, while evoking archival systems where past, present, and potentialities overlap. These installations find their narrative extension in the film, where the same objects accompany a documentary-fiction structured in three parts: mystical, mechanical, and scientific. The film connects human gestures to environmental transformations, from the myth of the mountain to glaciology laboratories, questioning our relationship with water and the traces of time. Together, these works weave a dialogue between materiality, memory, and territory, interrogating the continuity between uses, imaginaries, and contemporary issues of perception and preservation.

In a moment of suspension, objects are handled by a scientist. These tools, used in medical contexts, are observed without their precise function always being defined. We closely follow the slow process of sterilization of these objects. This process questions how sanitary concerns have shaped our environment and our relationship to it. This pursuit of absolute cleanliness, initiated by the hygienist movement of the 19th century, continues to shape our cities and contemporary spaces. However, this obsession with eliminating risks can also lead to the creation of dehumanized and austere environments.

View of the exhibition at l'Attrape Couleurs, Places That Wait, 2025

Lisle lumineuse is a film that focuses on the transfiguration of a public space through the installation of a fairground attraction. At the heart of the ride's assembly in a village in the Périgord, it captures the transformation orchestrated by the work of a couple of owners. «The canvases stretch, the structures rise, and little by little, the empty space fills with new life. What was once an ordinary place becomes a gathering point where the community comes together, captivated by this ephemeral spectacle.» The editing unfolds like a realm of possibilities. Here, everything seems allegorical, and the carousel that emerges could symbolize each individual's capacity to take ownership of a space and turn it into a moment of exception.

Residency presentation, 2023 / Factatory – Galerie Tator

In 1836, the architect Charles Rohault de Fleury inaugurated the large greenhouses of the Jardin des Plantes in Paris, independent of sunlight thanks to steam-heating technology. Two years later, Paul and Justin Videau founded Le Bon Marché in the 7th arrondissement, implementing commercial strategies still relevant today (varied assortment, accessible prices, and the staging of merchandise) to stimulate the desire to buy. Fascinated by this parallel development, Sébastien Schnyder presents a series of nocturnal shots set to a mysterious soundscape. The empty stores and deserted vegetable displays respond to exotic plants flourishing in enclosed glass spaces. Everything seems frozen. Vitrine thus invites reflection on the notion of progress and on our behaviors as compulsive collectors, ready to bottle life itself and treat flora as a mere consumer product.
